TSI HSU'S DAILY TOILET.

Dowager Empress of China Rouged, Massaged and Revetized.

Tsi Hsu has always been extremely vain of the good looks to which her rise to power would seem originally to have been due. The cosmetical facilities of her palace to-day afford an outlet for the beautifying energies of no less than nine young ladies of the imperial suite.

Her Majesty is rouged every morning regularly after breakfast until her cheeks flame delicately against the creamy composition with which the rest of her face has been coated. A huge mirror is then rolled to the couch upon which the source of all power in China reclines.

Tsi Hsu studies the effect of the labors of her young ladies so critically that it is said to be necessary occasionally to rouge her twice or thrice before the technique of the operation quite realizes the imperial ideal. The monotony is made less tedious by song, the narration of court gossip, and not infrequent applications of Her Majesty's rattan cane to sensitive surfaces.

The penciling of the eyebrows and eyelashes has had to be abandoned, if we may trust French sources of information, owing to the growing weakness of the old lady's sight. But the lips continue to be carmined. The slightly stubborn growth of hair on chin and upper lip is dealt with after the fashion of those Western artists who obliterate black eyes by the application of heavy paint.

No attack of illness could be too severe to justify the slightest omission of cosmetical detail by the several ladies concerned with the Empress Dowager's toilet. Though Tsi Hsu be so ill that her day must be spent in bed, she is rouged, penciled and massaged on the floor of her back.

Years of study have made Her Majesty such a perfect mistress of the language of her educated subjects that her conversation is the model upon which the stylists of the court circle form themselves. Her rhetoric accords strictly with the nicest canons of the most correct taste. She never opens her mouth, we are told, unless she has framed in her mind beforehand the whole sentence she is about to utter.—Current Literature.
